Dear Ms. Dortch:

On December 7, 2007, the Voice on the Net (VON) Coalition held a series of meetings with the FCC to discuss issues of importance to the Coalition in the coming year. Although the discussions touched on a number of issues in various proceedings, the Coalition emphasized the potential for VoIP to introduce additional competition to the broadband market in the next decade or two thereby creating tens of billions of dollars in savings for the American consumer.

The VON Coalition highlighted three priorities, including:

- Ensuring that VoIP and new technologies are not hindered in their efforts to provide innovative and robust public safety and national security enhancing solutions. Specifically, any E9-1-1 autolocation requirements must be technically, operationally, and economically feasible and must not jeopardize existing progress or imperil public safety.
- Keeping a focus on comprehensive intercarrier compensation reform to ensure that consumers receive accurate pricing signals and are able to make rational purchasing decisions – thus driving broadband uptake. The Commission should avoid, rate-raising, innovation reducing, short term band-aids that drive up the costs for broadband users to talk with their analog counterparts.
- Preventing extension of rules to non-interconnected VoIP.

The meetings were attended as follows:

Jim Kohlenberger, the VON Coalition; Paula Boyd and Kevin Minsky, Microsoft; and Paul Kenefick, Earthlink held separate meetings with Scott Deutchman, Legal Advisor to Commissioner Michael Copps and Chris Moore, Legal Advisor to Commissioner Deborah Tate. The VON Coalition was joined by Amy Wolverton, T-Mobile for separate meetings with John Hunter, Legal Advisor to Commissioner Robert McDowell, Commissioner Jonathan Adelstein and Legal Advisor Scott
